In this brief seminar, we will grapple with the concept, principles, and application of “termination” in psychotherapy and psychoanalysis. What do we mean when we talk about termination? The immediate irony is that termination is often a process that can take months, even years to unfold, or can occur with little preparation, dramatically and precipitously. Clinicians and patients often feel deeply disrupted during the process, yet throughout clinical training, the discussion of termination is often left to the end, squeezed into curriculum. Often we rely on ideal models of endings, models that are relatively rare; curiously we never really know if there is a “right way” to close a treatment. The articles that we will read together provide us with only a few opportunities to address the numerous theoretical orientations regarding this concept. At the heart of it, we will be struggling with questions of attachment and loss in the clinical relationship, the meaning of endings, the conflict between personal and professional, and the implications of separation when there is no death.

The readings that have been chosen are meant to stimulate clinical and theoretical discussions. To that end, I would like to include a clinical presentation at each meeting and would like each of you to think about your cases and clinical experiences that may be relevant to our discussions that you would like to present.

Week 5:

Learning Objectives:
1. At the end of the session, students will be able to discuss three basic concepts related to termination, and the role of termination throughout the psychotherapy process.

2. At the end of the session, students will be able to compare two theoretical concepts regarding termination that have historical relevance to the Field of psychoanalysis.

3. At the end of this session, students will be able to identify at least two of the emotional challenges of termination from the perspective of the analyst.

4. At the end of the session, students will be able to assess two concepts of self-disclosure and its relationship to the termination process when the patient is an analyst and an analysand.

5. At the end of the session, students will be able to compare two different termination goals that are the focus of a 1-person and a 2-person psychoanalytic model.
